Hay 101: Tuning The Hay Harvest and Curing Process

By Rocky Lemus, PhD
Extension Forage Specialist
Mississippi State University

Excellent quality hay has a high nutritive value and animal intake. Hay quality can differ widely with single species grown in the same location due to management. The nutritive value of the final product depends on many factors in the hay production system such as maturity, curing and storage. Following good hay making practices ensures higher hay quality, which lowers the amount of nutrients needed for supplementation and translates into lower feed costs.

Of all the factors affecting hay quality, the stage of maturity is the most important and the one in which the greatest progress can be made. As plants mature from a vegetative (lush growth) to a reproductive stage (seed head), they become higher in fiber and lignin content. This lowers the protein content, digestibility and forage intake by the livestock. Commonly grown forages in Mississippi should be cut at the right stage.

For example, bermudagrass should be cut when height is 15 to 18 inches (four to five weeks), small grains (oats and wheat) at the boot stage (stage before seed emergence), summer annuals (sudangrass, sorghum hybrids, pearl millet) at 40 inches, and tall fescue at four to six weeks interval. Making cuts at the correct growth stage promote growth when temperature and soil moisture might be favorable for plant growth and could increase total yield per acre if optimum soil nutrients are available.

Hay made from the best adapted species and fertilized properly can still result in suboptimal forage if not properly handled and cured. The curing process involves different stages such as mowing, tedding, raking and baling. One common question asked is at what time of the day should I cut my hay? Hay should be cut when sugar and starch or total nonstructural carbohydrates (TNC) are highest in the plant. Plants have lower TNC in the morning because plants use carbohydrates for respiration during the night. TNC concentration increases throughout the day and usually reaches peak by 6:00 p.m.

It is recommended to cut hay in early to mid-afternoon because cutting hay too late in the day will not allow the hay drying substantially and losing TNC to respiration at night. TNC losses can also be affected by forage moisture and air temperature. When mowing hay, set the mower to make the swath as wide as possible. This exposes more of the forage to the drying effects of the sun and wind. Conditioning (crushing the stems) at the time of mowing will improve curing by allowing the stems to dry at nearly the same rates as the leaves. Conditioning has been shown to decrease the drying time of large stemmed plants by almost one day, resulting in less leaf and nutrient loss.

Hay tedding is only valuable for turning the swath and allowing the forage that was on the bottom or in clumps to come to the top and dry better, resulting in a more uniform drying pattern. Tedding should usually be done the morning after the hay has been cut and after the dew is off. Producers should be cautious on tedding hay that is too dry or tedding too often because this can create leaf chattering and cause losses in forage quality and yield.

Raking will allow for increased drying before the hay is baled. It is important to rake in a way that will minimize leaf loss. Raking when the hay is slightly brittle and not covered with dew will reduce leaf loss. It is important to set the rake at an optimum speed that will minimize forage losses.

Baling is the final step in hay curing. Optimum moisture for baling can range from 15% to 20% depending on the type of forage species and the type and size of bale being made. Baling at moisture levels lower than 15% will result in greater harvesting losses because leaf losses increase as moisture content decreases. On the other hand, storing hay at moisture levels greater than 20% can result in molding and heating, which translate into hay discoloration and greater dry matter and nutrient losses.

Although there are electronic moisture meters that can be used in the windrow, they are more accurate on determining moisture content when the hay is baled. An experienced hay producer might be able to take a handful of hay from the underside of the windrow and twist it to determine if the hay is dry enough. If the stems are brittle and free of moisture, the hay should be in good condition for baling.

All bales made at moisture content above 15% will undergo some increase in temperature in the first two to three weeks post-baling. This change in temperature is known as “sweating” or “going through sweat,” and this is due to the final stage of plant and microbial respiration. This increase in temperature can cause spontaneous combustion if bales are stored too tight or in close environments. When storing hay in a barn or outdoors, do not stack more than five tiers high before the hay has gone through the sweating process. After the sweat when temperatures lower, more tiers can be added to the stack without fire danger.

Fire danger usually increases when bales reach temperatures above 150° F. Heating bales must be moved to prevent the stack or barn from burning. Check the bale moisture content by using a hay moisture probe to determine the potential for greater respiration. To measure the bale temperature, use a thermometer that can be pushed at least 12 inches into the bales, check the temperature from at least 20 different bales. Monitor the hay stack daily until the sweat period is over.

Hay production can be a complicated process. Yet producing high-quality hay should be a goal of each hay producer. Cutting hay at proper stage of maturity and moisture content and providing proper fertilization will allow livestock producers to get higher-quality hay and reduce possible supplementation.

Don't Guess, Hay Test! Know what you are feeding and supplement with protein or energy when necessary. A successful hay production and utilization depends on the integration of harvest management, hay preservation, and quality analysis. Always remember that haymaking is an art and understanding the science behind it can help hay producers to make a cost-effective and nutritional livestock feed.

Rural Lands Continue to Increase in Value

By Dr. Daryl Jones
MSU Extension Service

Hunting, fishing, wildlife watching, outdoor physical exercise and other outdoor recreation mean millions of dollars for Mississippi annually.

Mississippi State University scientists recently found that wildlife-related recreation generates about $2.9 million in economic impact to the state each year. Some of the money spent on outdoor recreation goes to small, rural Mississippi communities that would not see these expenditures otherwise.

Outdoor recreation requires access to public or private land or water. People often purchase land for hunting and angling. Some buy land to locate houses or cabins so they can own a piece of "the great Mississippi outdoors." This trend has influenced the value of rural land, particularly property with fish ponds, beautiful sites for dream homes, or productive habitats for game and nongame wildlife species.

MSU scientists conducted a recent survey in cooperation with the Federal Land Bank of Mississippi and Mossy Oak Properties. They found that individuals purchased property in Mississippi specifically for outdoor recreation. Based on survey results reported for nearly 600 Mississippi properties, one-third of the dollar value of rural lands ($634 per acre, on average) was due to outdoor recreational potential.

Most of these properties were forested with a mixture of stands including bottomland hardwood trees, mixed pine-hardwood forests, upland hardwood forests, pine plantations and natural pine stands. Other tracts included agricultural land predominately planted in row crops and land that was fallow, contained roads or had supplemental plantings for wildlife.

We learned some land attributes were very important to buyers looking for recreational property. For example, forested habitats -- particularly of hardwood tree species -- provide excellent habitats for a diversity of wildlife species, both game and nongame. Buyers who intend to hunt recreationally are looking for these land types because of their plentiful white-tailed deer and wild turkey populations.

Additionally, property tends to have a higher sales value when it is adjacent to larger public lands that support outdoor activities. Owners of such property can recreate not only on their private land but also on the larger public land and water nearby.

When someone is shopping for recreational land, some tracts are much more inherently valuable than others. The most sought-after will be quality private lands with ponds for fishing and forests with open spaces and pastures that support diverse wildlife species. This fact is important whether you're considering selling or purchasing property. Your piece of rural Mississippi will only become more valuable in the future.

I'm often reminded of the scene in "Gone With the Wind" when Gerald O'Hara describes his love for Tara: "Why, land is the only thing in the world worth workin' for because it's the only thing that lasts." It is hard to argue with that reasoning.

Mississippi Agricultural
& Livestock Theft Bureau - MDAC

Investigator Keith Settlemares of Corinth was awarded as this year's "Top Cop" for the Mississippi Department of Agriculture and Commerce's (MDAC) law enforcement division, the Mississippi Agricultural and Livestock Theft Bureau (MALTB) at the 2018 Police Memorial and Appreciation Day luncheon. The memorial was held during Police Memorial Week and recognized law enforcement officials from state and federal agencies, along with agencies from the Jackson metro.

The event was hosted by local law enforcement agencies along with the Mississippi Center for Police and Sheriffs and Central Mississippi Crime Stoppers at the Mississippi Trade Mart in Jackson.

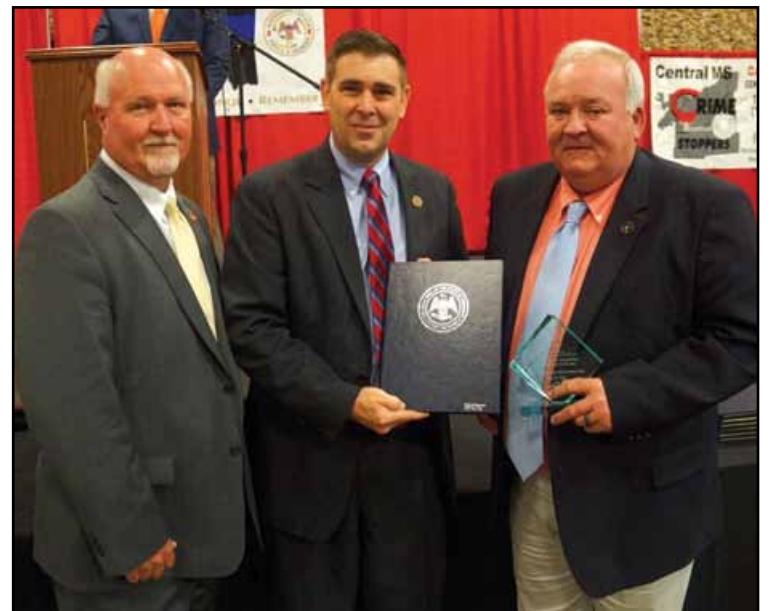

Settlemares has 22 years of law enforcement experience and has served the MALTB as an investigator for 20 years. He covers investigations relating to agricultural-related crimes that are committed in District 4, which consists of nine counties located in Northeast Mississippi.

Recently, he assisted the New Albany Police Department and the Union County Sheriff's Department in arresting five suspects in a tractor theft operation that occurred over the past seven years and spanned across several states. Those states include Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, Missouri and Tennessee. The arrests led to the recovery of 10 John Deere tractors and other agricultural equipment valued at $500,000.

Settlemares has dedicated his law enforcement career to serving the agriculture industry in Mississippi, and the state has benefitted tremendously from his tireless work ethic.

The MALTB enforces and investigates state laws pertaining to the theft of cattle, horses, swine, poultry, fish, farm equipment, chemicals, timber and all other farm or agriculture related crimes. To report or provide information regarding an agricultural crime, call the tip line at 1-800-678-2660.
