Drought Projected to Dock From Hay Harvest

By Robert Nathan Gregory
MSU Extension Service

Last year's drought will likely affect this year's hay acreage in Mississippi.

Rocky Lemus, forage specialist with the Mississippi State University Extension Service, said he anticipates about 690,000 hay acres. The state had about 750,000 acres devoted to hay production in 2016.

Mississippi livestock producers heavily depend on perennial warm-season grasses -- mostly bahiagrass and bermudagrass -- for their grazing systems. The state had just over 900,000 acres of bahiagrass and 770,000 acres of bermudagrass last year. Stand losses and hay field renovations are expected to drive bermudagrass production down 10 percent.

Despite last year's dry conditions, rainfall totals have been closer to average this spring, causing bermudagrass and bahiagrass to break dormancy at least two weeks before they normally do across the state. Lemus said this will allow early grazing and, perhaps, early production.

"Because of the mild winter, we also have seen an increase in winter weed pressure," he said. "Controlling those weeds, along with taking a soil sample to determine nutrient management recommendations that will aid pasture recovery after the drought, is very important."

Pasture management and productivity are equally important, Lemus added. The ideal time to have summer pastures ready for grazing can range from mid-April in the south to mid-May in the northern part of the state.

"Now is a good time to walk your pastures and hay fields, determine stand losses, and develop a management plan that could help with pasture renovation or pasture restoration," he said. "Growers who have planted annual ryegrass into a bermudagrass or bahiagrass sod for winter grazing should put a heavy grazing pressure this time of year to open that canopy and allow the release of the summer grasses."

Brett Rushing, Extension and research professor at the MSU Coastal Plain Branch Experiment Station in Newton, said renovating pastures is an expensive process that causes growers to temporarily lose grazing areas during establishment.

"When renovating, soil fertility must be addressed before any planting event," Rushing said. "Unfortunately, seed costs for a lot of warm-season grasses this year are very high. Production was limited due to last year's drought, so supplies are short."

Producers who may be interested in renovating pastures can consider using warm-season annuals such as millet, crabgrass and sorghum-sudangrass hybrids as a quick return for grazing this summer, he added.

"These forages produce ample amounts of quality dry matter for 60-120 days of grazing, depending on stocking rates and grazing management," Rushing said. "Pastures can then be converted into a cool-season annual in the fall once they have been grazed out."

Long-range forecasts indicate more of the same conditions for growers this summer. High heat will help the No. 1 pest for Mississippi forage: armyworms.

"Above-average temperatures, combined with a rainfall deficit from last fall, are somewhat optimal conditions for outbreaks to take place this summer," Rushing said. "Populations are determined by moth migrations from south Florida and Central America. Timing of these migrations will influence their effects on Mississippi producers."

Lemus noted that infestations could also occur earlier than usual due to warm-season forage breaking dormancy ahead of schedule.

"There is a forecast of possible drought conditions this summer, so growers need to start thinking about contingency plans to maintain forage productivity," Lemus said. "Those will include fertilization, rotating pastures, providing rest and sometimes evaluating livestock inventory. Pasture rest and recovery is an important component of a grazing system, and overgrazing can lead to stand loss, greater weed competition and economic losses."

Superbells Supertunias Offer Summer Beauty

By Dr. Gary Bachman
MSU Extension Service

One thing I dig about the summer season is the selection of annual color available for the garden and landscape.

I think most of my readers know I really like Supertunias. Besides their tremendous growth potential, I think what I like best are the flower shapes. There's something about a funnel-shaped flower that adds a little extra pizzazz to the landscape.

This year, I'm going to plant more of a hybrid called Superbells. These are tough plants with good summer heat tolerance.

One of the attributes I like about Superbells is their ability after a rainstorm to recover and perk up faster than many other summer-flowering annuals. These plants look great in containers and hanging baskets, as well as massed in landscape beds.

I'm really impressed with the range of colors available in Superbells.

In the past several years, I've grown some pretty outstanding landscape performers. I've had Superbells like Cherry Star that feature bright, cherry-red flowers with a yellow starburst in the center. Lemon Slice is a bright, cheerful yellow with a white, pinwheel-center pattern. Saffron flowers have golden-yellow petals and red artist highlights in the center.

One of the best selections I've grown was Superbells Pomegranate Punch. This plant has deep, velvet-petaled petals and an almost black center eye that drew many compliments from around my neighborhood all summer long. This year, I'm growing a new-to-me selection called Superbells Tropical Sunrise that features flowers with a variety of yellow and pinkish-red streaks.

I greatly appreciate the heat-tolerant flowering of Superbells, especially as petunias start to fade late in the summer in south Mississippi.

Superbells Supertunias will grow up to 10 inches high, and their trailing and spreading growth will hang over the edges of the container. You can plant Superbells in the landscape, where they will spread up to 48 inches, depending on the variety.

Make sure your landscape soil is well drained, as these plants don't like wet feet. Raised beds -- which are sort of like growing in a container -- are a must.

To keep the plants blooming all summer, feed them with a balanced, controlled-release fertilizer; a tablespoon in the planting hole will get the plants off to a good start. Regular applications of water-soluble fertilizer will maintain the nutrition at optimum levels to keep the foliage dark green and the flowering nonstop.

At planting, use sharp scissors to snip the branches a little bit to encourage full-looking growth. The plants may open up a little bit during the summer, so go ahead and give the plants an overall trim. This pruning will stimulate more growth, so trim any time the plants get a little untidy. Be sure to fertilize right after these trimmings.

Start making plans now to include Superbells in your garden and landscape this summer.

tunnels and pastured poultry.

The field day is free, but preregistration is required. Onsite check-in begins at 10 a.m. The program begins at 10:30 a.m. and ends at 2:30 p.m. Levee Run Farm is located at 802 Grenada Boulevard Extended in Greenwood.

MSU Hosts May 20 Dairy Open House

By Bonnie Coblentz
MSU Extension Service

Dairy producers who want to improve their cattle management skills can spend a half day seeing how Mississippi State University researchers handle their herd.

The 2017 MSU Dairy Open House will be from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. May 20 at the MSU Bearden Dairy Research Center near Starkville. The event is hosted by the MSU Extension Service and the Department of Animal and Dairy Sciences. There is no cost to attend the open house, and lunch will be provided.

Topics will include effective feeding of pastured cows, the economics of using center pivots in dairy herd management, and how and why heat stress should be managed. Attendees can tour the MSU farm and see the dairy center's center pivot irrigation in action.

MSU's dairy herd includes approximately 40 pasture crossbred cows, 50 Jersey cows and 110 Holstein cows.

The MSU Bearden Dairy Research Center is located at 2128 Turkey Creek Road in the Sessums community outside Starkville. For more information on the event, contact Stone at amanda.stone@msstate.edu or 662-769-9941.

Natural Resources Workshop Set For May 16 in Raymond

By Melissa Denise Grimes
MSU Extension Service

Landowners and hunting clubs eager to earn extra income while improving land management for wildlife are invited to attend a Natural Resource Enterprises Business Workshop.

The May 16 event will take place at Pecan Hill Farms in Raymond. Daryl Jones, a Mississippi State University Extension Service instructor, is director of the MSU Natural Resource Enterprises program.

"Landowners and farmers can seek new and innovative ways to earn extra money," Jones said. "These workshops are designed for landowners interested in learning about developing enterprises from the natural resources on their property or simply learning more about wildlife and business management."

Attendees will learn about marketing, ways to reduce liability, recreational enterprise potential, available cost-share programs, management for waterfowl and other natural resources, and nuisance wildlife, such as wild hogs.

Registration is $25 per person or $30 per couple, which includes lunch and reference materials. Advance registration is required at <http://www.wildlifeworkshop.msstate.edu>.
