Mississippi Agriculture Nears $7.4 Billion

By Robert Nathan Gregory
MSU Extension Service

In 2019, Mississippi's agricultural industry faced the prospect of dipping below $7 billion for the first time in eight years, but federal payments pushed its value up enough to post a slight gain over 2018.

The estimated value of Mississippi agriculture in 2019 is $7.39 billion, a 0.2% gain from last year's $7.37 billion. Included in the total is an estimated $628 million in government payments, the largest amount of federal assistance Mississippi producers have seen since 2006.

The total value not including those payments is an estimated $6.8 billion. 2011 was the last time total values prior to government payments were below $7 billion.

Keith Coble, head of the Mississippi State University Department of Agricultural Economics, said the projected increase in net revenues reflects a nationwide trend.

"Government payments such as Market Facilitation Program payments are meant to mitigate farmer income losses due to the trade war with China," Coble said. "The 2019 program is based on national commodity price changes estimated to reflect market losses and the county aggregate crop mix in 2019. Cotton and soybeans had the largest relative losses for 2019.

"County payments range from $15 to $150 per acre," he added. "Variation across Mississippi counties is largely driven by the relative percentage of cotton grown in the county."

Poultry production was down 3% to an estimated $2.78 billion. The state's forestry industry held steady at $1.15 billion. Livestock production was down 2% to an estimated $388 million. Catfish production was up 5% to just over $172 million.

The commodity group with the most fluctuation was row crops. At an estimated $2.3 billion, overall totals were down 6.5% from 2018. Most notably, corn vaulted 39% from last year, while soybean values dipped 27%.

"The U.S.-China tariff standoff had a major impact on crop markets and production this year," said MSU Extension Service row crop economist Will Maples. "Coming into the planting season, price signals were not very favorable to plant soybeans as the harvest month futures contract price hovered around $9 a bushel. The low price of soybeans was due to our trade issues, which made corn and cotton the more attractive crops to plant this year."

Soybeans were still the most profitable row crop despite the standoff and reduced acreage. Production values fell to $762 million in 2019 after eclipsing $1 billion last year. Producers planted fewer than 2 million acres of the crop for the first time since 2012.

Cotton growers had a strong crop this year, planting more than 700,000 acres with average yields of 1,082 pounds per acre. However, lower cotton prices offset increases in the value of total production that would typically follow. The estimated total production was about $585 million, an increase from last year of about 1%.

Maples said cotton acreage was up 95,000 acres this year.

"The drop in cotton price was not directly tied to the trade war with China but a symptom of it," Maples said. "Due to low soybean prices, the U.S. overall planted a lot more cotton than the market expected, and the extra supply dropped prices."

The value of corn production was the highest it has been in six years, checking in at nearly $455 million thanks to a 160,000-acre increase in acreage and slightly better market prices than last year.

Hay is expected to have nearly $151 million in value this year, which is a 25% increase. Rounding out the top five in row crop production was specialty crops, which held steady at nearly $106 million.

Sweet potatoes were a $95 million industry despite falling 11% from 2018. This crop outperformed rice, whose value fell 19% from last year to about $91 million.

Peanut production in Mississippi was worth $16.3 million this year, while grain sorghum values were slightly over $1 million.

Percentagewise, the row crop seeing the largest production decrease was wheat. The estimated $4.8 million total is almost a 33% drop from last year.

Forestry Remains Steady, Maintains Second Place

By Susan M. Collins-Smith
MSU Extension Service

Mississippi's timber industry remained its second highest producing agricultural commodity again in 2019.

Coming in with an estimated production value of $1.15 billion, timber followed the state's poultry industry, which generated an estimated value of $2.78 billion in 2019. Timber's value of production is estimated by monthly severance taxes collected by the Mississippi Department of Revenue.

"When I compare the total severance tax collected through October 2019, it is above both 2018 and 2017 so far," said John Auel, an assistant Extension professor of forestry in Mississippi State University College of Forest Resources. "The price per ton for the various products has remained steady with a slight drop for pine sawtimber between 2018 and 2019. If the volumes severed for November and December are the same as last year, the overall value should be slightly higher than in 2018."

The year-end values are estimates based on available data. Final figures will be available in February.

Housing starts are a major driver of production value because of the construction industry's demand for sawtimber. Since the housing collapse and recession of 2008, housing starts have struggled to reach pre-2009 levels.

"The value harvested and delivered in 2009, right after the housing collapse and recession, was only $864 million. We bounced back in 2010 up to $1.042 billion and peaked in 2015 with a value of $1.67 billion," said Auel, who is also a researcher with the Mississippi Agricultural and Forestry Experiment Station. "We have been in a downward trend since 2015 and hopefully, 2018 was the low point. We should see the value remain steady or slightly increase with 2019 numbers."

Mississippi is a timber-rich state with 63 percent of its land area covered in forests. Seventy-seven percent of that timber is owned by private, nonindustrial landowners who have faced limited markets since the downturn in the economy 10 years ago. Depending on where landowners live, they may or may not have options to thin tree stands or harvest larger trees. Markets vary north and south of Interstate 20.

Traditional pulp mills, which process young or lesser quality timber, have disappeared in north Mississippi and other areas of the state as overseas markets with less expensive labor have taken on the production of pulp and paper. South Mississippi landowners have access to a few pellet facilities that utilize mostly pine pulpwood.

"Georgia Pacific announced the closure of one of their Port Hudson, Louisiana, paper machines, which sourced a sizeable amount of hardwood pulpwood from southwest Mississippi," Auel said. "However, they are building a new pellet facility in southeast Mississippi, which will help with the excess pulpwood on the stump there. But there have been no new industry developments in north Mississippi."

The closure of the Port Hudson mill will impact pulpwood markets, particularly hardwood, in south Mississippi, said Shaun Tanger, Extension forestry specialist.

"That mill was a monster," he said. "It took in wood from as far north as Alexandria, Louisiana. We should continue to see some drop off in terms of production value in the hardwood pulpwood segment because of the volume they handled."

Replacing that hardwood pulpwood market for south Mississippi growers will be tough. However, the new Enviva pellet facility should provide a good outlet for pine pulpwood. It will be located in Lucedale and is touted to be the largest pellet mill in the world, Tanger said.

"I expect this pellet mill in conjunction with a few others we have will help stabilize the pine pulpwood market in the Southeast," he said.

Tanger said markets generally should remain neutral in terms of sale prices, but quantities will continue to rise along with the housing market rebound in the short term.

"Housing numbers are continuing to inch up, and if that continues, it is possible we could see some new sawmills announced in the next several years. But we would want to see the housing numbers stay on the incline. They wouldn't have to go through the roof, but the starts would need to continue to rise to keep those mills coming online and not losing existing smaller mills if housing falters."

Unfortunately, for some landowners, the slight rise may not be enough. Without desirable market prices, some timber owners already are choosing to exercise their options to convert their property to other uses, including pasture or real estate.

"The current prices just aren't sufficient for a lot of people who intended to use their timber as an income source," Tanger said. "But for those who own their property for reasons other than income, they have other options. They could sell the property or go whole hog and develop it for wildlife or a natural resources enterprise like duck hunting and lease it out for hunting opportunities. But that would require further investment, and in most markets, the costs would outweigh the benefits."

Poultry Retains the Top Spot in Mississippi Agriculture

By Bonnie A. Coblenz
MSU Extension Service

Overcoming every challenge that comes its way, Mississippi's poultry industry maintained its 25-year streak in 2019 as the state's No. 1 agricultural commodity.

Broilers, eggs and chickens brought an estimated $2.78 billion to the state's economy, down 3 percent from a record high in 2018. The biggest challenges came from reduced egg prices and a huge industry shift to "no antibiotic ever" -- or NAE -- poultry production.

Tom Tabler, Mississippi State University Extension Service poultry specialist, said recent years have been difficult for the industry.

"Part of the challenge has been that more and more companies are producing chickens with NAE," Tabler said. "To make NAE work, you have to stress the birds less. That means most companies have gone to a longer downtime between one flock and the next, and decreasing the density of the birds in the houses.

"Both of those amount to decreased pay to farmers. They are paid on the pounds of meat they sell, and reducing the density reduces the number of pounds they will sell," he said. "In addition, increasing the downtime between flocks may mean they will have fewer flocks per year."

Historically, poultry producers have used a tiny amount of antibiotic at the hatchery and a small amount in the feed. This antibiotic allowed the birds to overcome most sicknesses they might have encountered in their lives.

Broilers grown without antibiotics have to be grown in cleaner, more uniform and less stressed situations. Mortality rates are higher, as chickens that contract a sickness may not be treated, or the treatment may be postponed based on the specifics of particular NAE programs.

"Everything has to be done better because NAE birds cannot take much stress," Tabler said. "Raising NAE birds forces us to go back to the basics and get things right from the start to the finish, from pullet flocks to broilers."

Tabler said this process ultimately is a good thing, as it requires operations to be very clean and careful. However, it practically requires learning how to grow chickens all over again.

"We're having to learn to do things differently and better," he said.

Mississippi is on pace with this national trend to NAE poultry production, Tabler said. About half the chickens produced in the United States are in some form of NAE program. Ironically, although many consumers want NAE chicken, they are unwilling to pay higher prices, and NAE chicken has a higher cost of production.

"NAE is a doable program, but it is less sustainable, has more of a carbon footprint and makes a greater environmental impact because you have to hatch more chickens because more die. More chickens use more feed and water, produce more waste that must be managed in an environmentally sound manner, and require more land to grow additional feed grain," Tabler said.

"American markets are demanding more of this product, but world markets do not," he said.

Josh Maples, Extension agricultural economist, said despite this challenge, broiler production is estimated to be slightly higher in 2019 than it was in 2018.

"An estimated 804 million broiler chicks were hatched in Mississippi in 2019 compared to 800 million in 2018," Maples said.

In 2018, U.S. broilers averaged 98 cents per pound. The estimate for 2019 is 88 cents per pound.

"Larger broiler supplies are one of the reasons for weaker prices in 2019 as compared to 2018," Maples said.

Eggs experienced a 33 percent decline in overall value, the result of increased production and larger supplies.
